Abstract

The article tries to highlight diachronically the evolution of the relation between the market policy of the European Institutions, community legislation regarding customer protection and the used instrument of legislative technique, and also the impact of this relation upon the national judicial orders of the member states.

The admittance of the customer protection in the primary law, through The Unique European Act, will be valued as an autonomous social policy and law source only after the adoption of the Lisbon Treaty and of The European Union Charter of Fundamental Rights conversion into a judicial act with a constraining value for the member states.

This is also the moment in which the problem of giving up the vertical directives of minimum harmonization is raised in respect of some instruments regarding law which is designed to increase the integration of the older European actors: the horizontal directives of total harmonization, and even the regulations, with the purpose of automatically insert into the judicial order of the member states.

The reverse of such legislative evolution is represented by the predictable disappearance of European Law of Consumption, dissolved in a unique European Law of Contracts or in a unique European Civil Code.
